Gray was born in 1940 in New York City. She studied painting at the Art Students League and later worked as a photojournalist for several magazines. In the late 1960s, she began experimenting with photography as an artistic medium.

Gray's early work was influenced by the Pop Art movement. She created colorful, often humorous images that celebrated the mundane objects of everyday life. However, she soon grew disillusioned with Pop Art's superficiality. She began to explore darker themes in her work, such as death, violence, and sexuality.

In the early 1970s, Gray began to create her most controversial work. She photographed close-ups of body parts, often in extreme detail. The resulting images are both beautiful and disturbing. They challenge viewers' notions of beauty and normalcy.

Gray's work has been exhibited in museums and galleries around the world. It has been praised by critics for its originality and its ability to provoke thought. However, it has also been criticized for its disturbing nature. Some viewers find Gray's work to be offensive and exploitative.

Despite the controversy, Gray has continued to produce challenging and thought-provoking work throughout her career. She is a true visionary artist who is not afraid to push boundaries.
